Co-designing pathways for transformative change

Online International Winter School on Sustainable Development for Bachelor's and Master's Students

Achieving human well-being and eradicating poverty for all people on earth – while protecting our planet's climate and biodiversity – will require transformative change. You can be a part of this change. But to help transform the world, we need to understand the challenges we face and our role in these.

Join us at the 2025 International Winter School on Sustainable Development to deepen your understanding of these issues – through creative, interactive, and participatory learning.

Current global sustainability challenges are increasingly complex. Really understanding what's at stake requires knowledge on systemic interactions and on competing claims by different actors. Science, thus, has a major role to play in informing negotiations and solutions to guide the societal transformations needed to achieve the UN Sustainable Development Goals.

The purpose of this Winter School is to empower participants to act in the face of these challenges. In this nine-day online course, experienced sustainability researchers will highlight the most important development issues in their respective fields. These presentations will alternate with study time where participants can deepen their knowledge individually or in groups. Moreover, participants will form interdisciplinary teams in which they will co-design solutions to concrete sustainability challenges.
